Balmerino, who was present, rejoined indignantly, It is a lie, raised to excuse their barbarity to us. And as no such order was ever produced to the world, and as such an order would have been entirely at variance with the whole character of Charles, we may rest assured that no such order ever existed, and that the tale was but a foul calumny, either coined or sanctioned by the duke, who felt that, without some deception of the kind, the whole world must join in condemning the thirst for blood which he displayed throughout the course of these unhappy proceedings. Kilmarnock, who still entertained some hopes of a reprieve, renewed his assurances of contrition on the scaffold, declaring himself satisfied with the legality of King Georges title, and expressing a wish that all who had embarked in the Pretenders cause might meet the same fate. Balme-rino, on the contrary, was calm and cheerful. He had arrayed himself in the uniform which he had worn at Culloden, and trod the scaffold without levity, but with all the composure of a general in a field of battle. He examined his coffin, and smiled at the inscription; felt the edge of the axe, and looked with seeming pleasure at the block, which he called his pillow of rest. He then put on his spectacles, and read a written speech in an audible voice, afterwards handing the manuscript to the sheriff. The king, says Horace...
